

Spirituality

Cardinal Gerhard Muller, then-prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, attends a Vatican news conference in this Oct. 25, 2016, file photo. Cardinal Muller released a "Manifesto of Faith" Feb. 8. (CNS/Paul Haring)

Carol Glatz

View Author Profile

Catholic News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

Vatican City — February 11, 2019

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

Updated 10:53 a.m. Central time February 12, 2019 with comments from Cardinal Kasper

To keep silent about the truths of the Catholic faith or to teach the contrary is a form of religious deception that comes from the anti-Christ, said Cardinal Gerhard Muller.

The purpose of the church and its members, he said, is to lead people to Jesus, so all Catholics, but especially priests and bishops, "have a responsibility to recall these fundamental truths" and to strengthen the faith "by confessing the truth which is Jesus Christ himself."

The German theologian, who was head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith from 2012 to 2017, wrote what he called a "Manifesto of Faith." Subtitled with a verse from John 14:1, "Do not let your hearts be troubled," the five-page manifesto was released to several Catholic news sites Feb. 8.

"In the face of growing confusion about the doctrine of the faith, many bishops, priests, religious and laypeople of the Catholic Church have requested that I make a public testimony about the truth of revelation," he wrote.

While Muller did not mention Pope Francis in his document, many people read it as a challenge to the pope; for example, LifesiteNews, one of the outlets that originally published the text, labeled it "a quasi correction of Pope Francis' pontificate."

But another German theologian and retired Vatican official, Cardinal Walter Kasper, criticized the document, describing it as "not about a manifesto of faith, but rather a manifesto of private theological conviction that cannot be universally binding."

Kasper, who served as president of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity from 2001 to 2010, said the document contains "sweeping statements" and "many expressions of faith, which every devout Catholic" and also Lutheran

Christians "wholeheartedly affirm."

"In other places, there are sweeping statements that cannot stand in present form ... for example, when it is said that, 'the conscience of the faithful is not sufficiently formed.' This generalized sentence is damaging for many believers. And what will many say, when they think of priests who are accused of abuse? Are these priests' consciences adequately formed? What, above all, are abuse victims supposed to feel when a sentence such as 'The priest leads the work of salvation on earth,' is written in such a completely unspecific manner? The right distinction is what makes a theologian," Kasper said.

Kasper compared Muller's manifesto to the writings of Martin Luther.

"I was totally appalled when, toward the end of the manifesto, I read of the 'fraud of the anti-Christ.' This is almost literally reminiscent of Martin Luther's argumentation. Luther also criticized much in the church," Kasper said. "Is there a Luther redivivus behind this manifesto? One that advocates reform in the church, but intends to bypass the pope and oppose him? I do not want to believe that. Because that would only lead to confusion and fragmentation. That would rip the Catholic Church from its hinges."

In his document, Muller said St. John Paul II emphasized that "a sure norm for teaching the faith" is the Catechism of the Catholic Church, but that teaching has been put to the test by what Pope Benedict XVI called the "dictatorship of relativism."

Quoting extensively from the catechism, Muller summarized five key tenants of Catholic doctrine: belief in the Trinity; the nature and authority of the church; Christ's presence in the sacraments; the "liberating truth" of moral law; and the reality of hell and promise of eternal life.

"Many wonder today what purpose the church still has in its existence, when even bishops prefer to be politicians rather than to proclaim the Gospel as teachers of the faith," he wrote.

"The role of the church must not be watered down by trivialities, but its proper place must be addressed," he wrote in his summary of the immortal nature of the soul and the judgment each person will face immediately after death.

"Either a purification" is still necessary or the person enters into the blessedness of heaven, he wrote. However, "there is also the dreadful possibility that a person will remain opposed to God to the very end, and by definitely refusing his love, condemns himself immediately and forever."

"The eternity of the punishment of hell is a terrible reality," he wrote, and it is the place where the souls of those who die in a state of mortal sin descend.

Advertisement

Speaking about the sacraments of the church, the cardinal said the truth revealed in Jesus is the point of reference, not the opinion "of the majority or the spirit of the times."

"The task of the magisterium of the church is to 'preserve God's people from deviations and defections' " so that they may profess "the true faith without error," particularly concerning the church's seven sacraments, he said. "Anyone conscious of a grave sin must receive the sacrament of reconciliation before coming to Communion."

Muller said that means that divorced and civilly remarried persons, whose sacramental marriage is considered valid before God, Christians who are not in full communion with the Catholic faith, and those who are not "properly disposed" must not receive Communion.

This was another area with which Kasper took issue, saying he could not find Muller's arguments in the catechism.

"I looked it up twice and did not find that statement there," said Kasper. "The manifesto speaks of remarried divorced individuals whose first marriage 'stands before God.' Thus it obviously assumes that there are also those whose first marriage does not stand before God. Who can decide that, and how?"

Muller said that when it comes to priestly ordination, it is not possible to ordain women.

"To imply that this impossibility is somehow a form of discrimination against women shows only the lack of understanding for this sacrament, which is not about earthly power but the representation of Christ, the bridegroom of the church," he wrote.

"To keep silent about these and the other truths of the faith" and to teach people what is contrary to the faith "is the greatest deception against which the catechism vigorously warns," he wrote.

It leads people to "a religious delusion" and is "the fraud of anti-Christ," who seeks to deceive those who are lost and those who have not accepted the love of the truth by which they would be saved.

In a final appeal, the cardinal quotes St. Paul's Second Letter to Timothy (4:1-5): "Proclaim the word; be persistent whether it is convenient or inconvenient; convince, reprimand, encourage through all patience and teaching.

"For the time will come when people will not tolerate sound doctrine but, following their own desires and insatiable curiosity, will accumulate teachers and will stop listening to the truth and will be diverted to myths," the passage continued.

- - -

Contributing to this story was Zita Ballinger Fletcher.